

Should institutional investors support investments tied to genocide?

Research shows that the vast majority of Americans want to avoid investments tied to genocide. Even so, many financial institutions invest in a handful of foreign oil companies, such as PetroChina, that help to fund the government of Sudan's deadly campaign of violence against millions of its citizens.

With a billion-dollar stake as of September 2011, JPMorgan Chase is one of PetroChina's largest investors. This proxy season, JPMorgan Chase shareholders can vote to tell the company to avoid investments tied to genocide. Last year, institutions voting for the genocide-free investing shareholder proposal included T. Rowe Price, AFSCME Employees Pension Plan, Christian Brothers and many others.

How will you vote? Will you draw the line at genocide?
